

Training Nurses for the Army

Future nurses of the American Army during an outdoor study hour at Walter Reed Hospital. Training units of the Army School of Nursing are now in operation at seven Army general hospitals.

A lecture upon a simple but important feature of nursing, the filling of the water bottle.

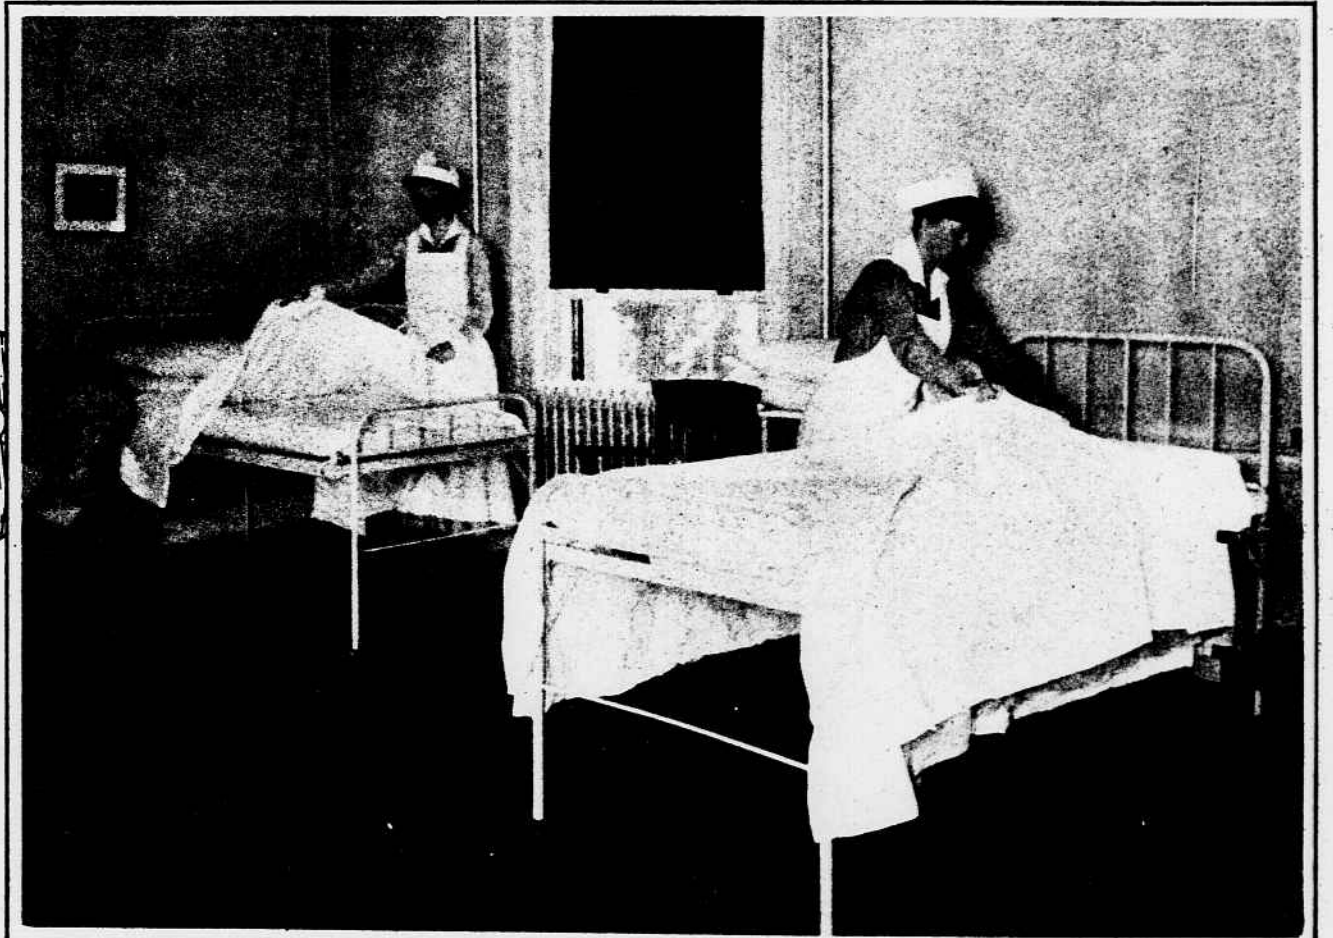

A lesson in bandaging.

Instruction in the making of pads and bandages.

These nurses in training are given thorough courses before being sent to France. The Army needs young women between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-five for the service.

Bed-making is one item of importance in the nurse's training.
